

7. During the last decade, the main structural reason for Australia's persistent current account deficit was
- (a) the interest rate differential between Australia and the United States.
 - (b) Australian investment in a rapidly-expanding Chinese economy.
 - (c) weak commodity prices for key Australian exports, such as coal and iron ore.
 - (d) interest and dividend payments in the primary income category.